Contrary to what we're often taught in school, the Japanese did not give up the use of firearms because they ended contact with the European nations. They were already making guns, for their own use and to export to China. Japanese flint-and-striker tobacco lighters may have inspired the use of a similar device in European firearms, although t

Firearms of Japan were introduced in the 13th century by the Chinese, but saw little use. Portuguese firearms were introduced in 1543, and intense development followed, with strong local manufacture during the period of conflicts of the late 16th century. Hōjutsu, the art of gunnery, is the Japanese martial art dedicated to firearms usage.

successfully suppress firearms in Japan? No. Actually, they didn't. Many American believe they did because they've vaguely heard the argument of Noel Perrin's book Giving Up The Gun, explaining that the Tokugawa Shogunate successfully suppressed firearms in Japan, partly by promoting the cult of the sword. But the book was wrong.
