With 'The Book of Gold Leaves', Mirza is now staking quiet claim as a confident, maturing writer. And it's that maturing, that heightened attention to craft and detail, the deepening of a sensibility that rescues the love story, of Roohi and Faiz, the papier mache artist and the beautiful same-mohalla girl, and that of the writer's love for his city and his people too, from the dangers of clichés the reader may discern in the early parts of the book.
